To my wonderful wife: Miss T

It all started years ago. I saw you when we were only beginning to be teenagers. I had always known you, but something clicked. It was a combination of a bunch of things, but some of it was your family and the things they did; they were so different from mine.

Then as we got more familiar, I found that I liked the modesty, the care for others, the desire to do the right thing, and just the basic honesty. In the end, I would up loving the whole person.

Somewhere in my late teens, I knew you were the one for me; the one I needed to be with everyday, and someone to be beside me for my whole life. I knew there were a lot more women out there, and even though we both tried other people in our college days, for me, there was never a time when it was not you.

You have always been the one for me, the best thing that ever happened to me, the one whom I could walk the world over to find.

I think a lot about these things now. I did not have much to offer back then, other than just loving you and wanting to be with you each and every day.

After all these years, a few things have changed, as we both know. We have gotten materially comfortable and now live debt-free in a nice house.

When I think of great things we have had together is is this. You got about 5 or 6 years of relatively good health and we got to travel all around the world. Of course, our travel is hardly tourist like, but that is what we do.

But I still want to be with you each and every day; I want to share my feelings, desires, wants, and triumphs with you. And I want to be "your man" each and every day that we both still live.

Your Loving Husband,

Jerry
